I feel my time in this space has been and will be deeply influential in my later years. Truthfully, I am unable to put into words how grateful I am for discovering this space. To meet people from all levels of society, walks of life, and nationalities. The online classroom for financial deviants.

I have always been a dreamer.

My parents had put me onto reading novels at the ripe age of 8, and from that moment onwards I had read thousands of novels, articles, manga, or whatever else I could really get my grubby little hands on. To me, reading was a form of dreaming, I would escape into these wonderous lands not bound by any earthly laws or conceptions.

An excerpt from one of my university applications:

> There's a spot in the living room, a faded cushion on which I spent the large majority of my childhood. From there, I'd sit with a book in my hand for hours on end, escaping into fantasy worlds from which I'd conjure up all the adventures and fun a young child could think of. While others preferred video games or movies, I was entranced by the unlimited possibilities of words on paper. I could do whatever I wanted, not constrained by any worldly matter. Every week, like a ritual, I would borrow dozens of novels, books from every walk of life. Even as I ran out of material from my library, I found a huge community online, where I would read translated foreign novels, fan-written tales of their favorite characters, and so much more. The pursuit of knowledge through the tireless consumption of literature has always been a central tenet in my life.

I have learned so much from this space. To those who are looking to learn — I would suggest remaining open, let no idea be too dumb, no project too scammy, everything is an experience. Explore chains outside of Eth, don't let your preconceptions hold you back.

If there is one thing I pride myself on, it's being able to find talented people. I am not the best dev, I am not the best mathematician, and I am not the smartest trader. However, I am able to find people who are significantly better than me and learn from them. Talking to people is an enjoyment, especially irl. Being a Computer Science major, the majority of my compatriots are tragically unable to communicate or interact with others "normally". That is not me. Truthfully being pure business or one of the more social majors would have been a much better fit. Alas, this is the era of technology and I have found my grove within this educational hell.

Takeaway? Find smart people and talk to them. Learn to talk to people.

There's really no personal story I can share here to make you empathize with my writing. Funny enough, I believe the best advice is abstract. So that the reader/listener can digest and formulate their own takeaways. Meh.

Waiting for your return.
Yours,
